

Short Term Missions: Are they worth the cost?

By: Jo Ann Van Engen

A missionary friend just called to see if we would house a short-term mission group she was coordinating here in Honduras. While on the phone, I asked her what she thought of these groups. Her answer might surprise you: "Everyone knows," she said, "that short-term missions benefit the people who come, not the people here."

Is that true? If so, then thousands of people are raising millions of dollars each year to do something not for others, but for themselves. Are we fooling ourselves by pretending these trips help people when they are really just an excuse to see a foreign country? If our good works are not doing good, why do them?

Take this example. A group of eighteen students raised $25,000 to fly to Honduras for spring break. They painted an orphanage, cleaned the playground, and played with the children. Everyone had a great time, and the children loved the extra attention. One student commented: "My trip to Honduras was such a blessing! It was amazing the way the staff cared for those children. I really grew as a Christian there."

The Honduran orphanage's yearly budget is $45,000. That covers the staff's salaries, building maintenance, and food and clothes for the children. One staff member there confided, "The amount that group raised for their week here is more than half our working budget. We could have done so much with that money."

Times have changed. Missionaries used to raise small fortunes to sail to Africa and Asia, often never returning home. The decision to become a missionary was life changing and usually permanent.

Today, air travel makes even the farthest corners of the earth accessible to anyone with money for a ticket and a few days to spare. Thousands of people--students, retirees, and busy professionals--go all over the world on short-term mission trips, building schools, running medical brigades, doing street evangelism, and working in orphanages.

Don't misunderstand me. I'm not saying that everyone goes on short-term missions to get a free vacation. People usually sign up for very good reasons—a successful doctor wants to use her skills to help needy people, a young person seeks to share his faith with others, a construction worker knows that cement floors will keep poor children healthier.

But maybe you've noticed the same thing I have. When people return from their trip, they don't talk about what they did, as much as what they saw and how it changed them. They describe how amazing it was to worship with Christians in another language, or how humbling it was to encounter people who live with less than they could ever imagine. They don't often talk about the importance of what they did, but about how much they learned about themselves.

Certainly short-term mission trips can go beyond religious tourism and provide memorable experiences. My husband and I run a semester-abroad program in Honduras. The college students who study with us often have been on previous international mission trips. They say these trips awakened their interest in the third world and the poor. For most, seeing a world outside North America that they had never imagined shook their reality and made them question their own lifestyles.

Our students call those experiences "life changing." But often that "life changing" experience is based on an emotional response to a situation they do not really understand. Too often the students return home simply counting the blessings they have of being North neighborhood. After the group left, I asked him about his experience. "I found out soon enough that I was in the way. The group wanted to do things their way and made me feel like I didn't know what I was doing. I only helped the first day," he said.

Because short-term groups often want to solve problems quickly, they can make third-world Christians feel incapable of doing things on their own. Instead of working together with national Christians, many groups come with a let-the-North-Americans-do-it attitude that leaves nationals feeling frustrated and unappreciated. Since the groups are only around for about a week, the nationals end up having to pick up where they left off but without the sense of continuity and competence they might have had they been in charge from the beginning.

These problems are not just pesky details. They raise serious questions about the value of short-term mission trips.

So, what should we do? Declare a moratorium on all short-term missions and only support full-time workers? Refuse to give money to any group planning to visit a developing country?

I don't think that is the answer. Our world is becoming smaller, and global business has made us all neighbors. Our lives in North America have become inextricably linked with our brothers and sisters in the third-world. Now, more than ever, Christians need to share one another's problems and support one another.

But short-term missions as they stand are not the answer. Third-world people do not need more rich Christians coming to paint their church and make them feel inadequate. They do need more humble people willing to share in their lives and struggles.

I believe North American Christians need to start taking seriously our responsibility to the people of the third world--and visiting another country can be an appropriate place to begin. But we need to ask each other: What is the purpose of the trip? Are we going through the motions of helping the poor so we can congratulate ourselves afterwards?

Or are we seeking to understand the lives of third- world people--to recognize and support their strengths and to try to understand the problems they face and our role in them? Are we ethnocentrically treating the people of the third-world as tragic objects to be rescued--or as equals to walk with and learn from?

I suggest we stop thinking about short-term missions as a service to perform and start thinking of them as a responsibility to learn. Let's raise money to send representatives to find out what our brothers and sisters are facing, what we can do to help, and how we can build long-term relationships with them.

Groups like the The Christian Commission for Development (CCD), in Honduras intentionally provide learning experiences to short-term groups. CCD accepts North Americans only if they are serious about learning. Their groups visit Christian development projects, speak with rural and urban poor, and dialogue with Honduran leaders.
